The arrow pointing at Danish callables

As expected, 2019 has so far been very active regarding supply in the Euro area, and also in Sweden. Covered bonds have performed despite the large supply, but the Nordic markets are lacking the performance seen in the Euro area. Decreasing rates and volatility are creating a duration scarcity in Denmark, leaving lower-coupon callables looking promising – hence, these are now our top pick in the Nordic space.

Cross-market relative value: Still wide versus government bonds

Covered bonds have performed in 2019 versus both swaps and govies, but Nordic bonds are lacking some of the performance seen in the Euro area. Despite the performance, we continue to find the spread attractive. The slope of the Swedish yield curve continues to flatten, thus reducing the roll advantage relative to Denmark. The FX forward hedged buying of Danish covereds is now more attractive at the short end and up to three years, with Swedish beyond. Adding all this up, we prefer the Danish low coupon callables given macro outlook which indicates an anchoring of rates at a lower level.

Denmark: Duration is becoming a scarcity

Rapidly decreasing rates in 2019 have reduced duration in the callable bond market corresponding to DKK 130bn DGB 0.5%29. This, in combination with decreasing volatilities and general spread performance in EUR covered and credit markets, means that lower-coupon callable bonds look promising. That said, investing in callables bonds is associated with more risk than bullet bonds, but we find the risk/reward attractive given the worsened macroeconomic outlook. The weakening pressure on the EUR/DKK led to intervention in both December and January, but the pressure has eased in recent weeks, pushing an independent Danish rate hike a little further into the future.

Sweden: Unexpectedly high demand driving issuance

Although we still expect 2019 to be a 'normal' issuance year with SEK 365-380bn in bond supply, the flush of issuance (SEK 52bn) that kicked off the year in January was a bit of a surprise. It is worth remembering that during 2018, a record SEK 435bn in benchmark bonds was issued and with lending slowing, supply should ease going forward. The Riksbank stayed passive at the policy meeting in February and Swedish macro has cooled considerably, leading to a market environment where investors look for roll and carry. The spread curve has consequently flattened and 5Y spreads have compressed markedly.

Finland and the Euro area: Spreads supported by waning supply

EUR covered bond supply was high in January (EUR 39bn), the highest since 2011 (EUR 41bn). Supply slowed in February but is still elevated compared with 2017 and 2018. We do not believe the large supply is a general trend but we ascribe it to many issuers likely pre-funding due to uncertainty over Brexit. Spreads moved significantly higher towards the end of 2018 (10-20bp) as QE increasingly became a worry. Entering 2019, spread levels were clearly attractive, and therefore high supply only initially pushed levels higher. Since peaking around mid-January, spreads have performed between 5bp and 10bp.

Norway: High EUR activity sheltering NOK covereds

Norwegian issuers have taken advantage of favourable conditions in the Euro market, issuing an above-normal two-thirds of the YTD volume. As the NOK investor base is limited, it makes sense for issuers to tap the Euro market and leave more room in the domestic market later this year if needed. With NOK issuance below average, we expect spreads to be contained going forward, as was demonstrated by the recent Nordea Eiendoms kreditt's NOK issue which came in 1 bp tighter than pre-auction levels despite the NOK 10bn record size.

Cross-market relative value

The good performance, particularly in Swedish covered bonds, now means Danish covered bonds out to three years have a higher yield when hedging with three-month FX forwards. For maturities over three years, Swedish covereds still give a high pickup relative to both Danish and EUR covered bonds. Including the roll on the steeper Swedish curve, the total pickup, ie yield+roll, still favours Swedish covereds. Note that this advantage has been reduced in line with the flattening of the Swedish curve. Hedging on a XCCY basis, we find that Danish covered bonds outperform peers except for maturities over five years.
